

Basic Detail Report

Shabti

Date

1142-1132 BC

Primary Maker

James Burton

Medium

Calcite, wax

Description

Fragment of a Shabti. Top half of a figure, resembling a wrapped mummy. On the front there are the remains of a crudely painted face, wig and arms in black. Patches of a green wax and red pigment remain. This shabti was found in the tomb of Ramesses V by James Burton and brought back to England. Similar fragments were found in the tomb bearing the cartouche of Ramesses VI indicating this shabti probably belonged to him also. A shabti was a kind of servant figure that was buried with the deceased and found in elite burials from the New Kingdom. In the afterlife the deceased was expected to help maintain the 'reed fields' where they would be living in the afterlife. If the deceased was called on to do manual labour the shabtis would take his place. To this end they were often depicted holding tools in their hands. Shabtis were commonly made of stone, wood, plaster, and faience. The number of shabtis included in a burial changed over the course of Egyptian history; in the 18th dynasty, only one shabti was common, but by the Third Intermediate Period they could have one for every day of the year! Some were inscribed only with the name and title of their master while others contained an inscription known as the 'shabti spell' or chapter 6 of the Book of Coming Forth by Day, better known as the Book of the Dead. This spell would make them answer when their master was called on to work. The word shabti means 'answerer'.

Dimensions

Object/Work: 70 x 41 x 26 mm